

Problems in the Code

BY TIMOTHY J. ANZENBERGER AND RICHARD P. CARMODY

Does the Bankruptcy Code Allow Tiered Chapter 13 Plans?

Under 11 U.S.C. § 1325, a chapter 13 plan must pay secured creditors the value of their claims. If a plan proposes to pay those claims in periodic payments — as most do — § 1325(b)(iii)(I) requires that those payments be in equal monthly amounts. However, the Bankruptcy Code is silent on when those payments begin. Section 1326(b)(1) requires that debtors pay priority administrative claims (such as attorneys' fees to debtors' counsel) before or at the time that general creditors are paid. As a result, many debtors propose "tiered" plans. These plans pay small adequate-protection payments to secured creditors while debtor's counsel is paid in full, with larger equal monthly payments to secured creditors following later.<sup>1</sup>

This trend is significant. Only 38.8 percent of chapter 13 debtors complete repayment plans.<sup>2</sup> While the Code requires debtors to pay secured creditors equal monthly payments sufficient to pay off secured claims, it is more likely that a chapter 13 case will be dismissed or converted before those equal monthly payments begin or are satisfied.

So, does the Code permit tiered plans? Bankruptcy courts are divided,<sup>3</sup> and even courts within the same federal districts have reached different results.<sup>4</sup> Given this uncertainty and split of authority, there is an obvious problem in § 1325 that Congress must resolve.

this caused two perceived abuses.<sup>5</sup> First, chapter 13 had no express requirement that secured creditors receive adequate-protection payments.<sup>6</sup> This permitted debtors to propose plans with payment moratoriums, allowing debtors to use collateral for months without payment.<sup>7</sup> These debtors could then convert their cases to chapter 7 or modify their plans to surrender the now-devalued collateral before payments began.<sup>8</sup> Second, chapter 13 plans could propose small payments over the plan's life with large balloon payments at the end.<sup>9</sup> Debtors could even propose quarterly or semi-annual payments or reduce payments during certain months of the year.<sup>10</sup>

When Congress enacted the Bankruptcy Abuse Prevention and Consumer Protection Act of 2005 (BAPCPA), it amended two provisions of chapter 13 to solve these issues.<sup>11</sup> First, BAPCPA amended § 1325(a)(5)(B) to require that debtors pay secured creditors equal monthly payments.<sup>12</sup> Second, BAPCPA amended § 1326(a) to require debtors to pay adequate-protection payments to secured creditors holding liens on personal property, with those payments starting no later than 30 days after the petition date.<sup>13</sup> Congress intended these amendments to eliminate fluctuating payment schemes and protect secured creditors from the threat of devalued collateral and early plan termination.

However, these amendments created a new problem. While BAPCPA required equal monthly payments to secured creditors, Congress failed to identify when those payments begin. For example, may a plan pay a secured creditor in full over the course of 12 months, but provide that monthly payments begin in year two of the plan after debtor's counsel is paid, or does the Code require that payments begin right after confirmation? Some bankruptcy courts have confirmed tiered plans, holding that payments may begin at any time, but other courts have rejected tiered plans, holding that equal monthly payments must begin just after confirmation.

Background of §§ 1325 and 1326

Before 2005, chapter 13 plans could propose creative payment structures to secured creditors, but

Argument for Tiered Chapter 13 Plans

Bankruptcy courts that have confirmed tiered chapter 13 plans have generally done so for three reasons. First, the Bankruptcy Code contains no express requirement that equal monthly payments begin at confirmation.<sup>14</sup> Some courts reason that these payments may begin at any time, so long as the payments are in equal monthly amounts when they begin, and so long as these payments continue until secured claims are paid in full.<sup>15</sup>

Second, § 1325(b)(iii)(II) requires that debtors make adequate-protection payments to creditors with claims secured by personal property starting 30 days after the petition date, so any delay in paying equal monthly payments will not harm these creditors. Adequate-protection payments must equal the amount of depreciation to a creditor's collateral so that these creditors "will not be left holding the bag for any loss in value of [their] collateral if the plan should later fail or become converted to a chapter 7 case."<sup>16</sup>

Section 1325(b)(iii)(II) does not specifically require debtors to make adequate-protection payments to creditors with claims secured by real property.<sup>17</sup> This is likely because the BAPCPA amendments to §§ 1325 and 1326 were targeted at "perceived abuses of car lessors and purchase money secured creditors."<sup>18</sup> However, courts have noted that creditors with claims secured by real property might still protect themselves by seeking adequate protection under §§ 362 or 363.<sup>19</sup> At least one court has confirmed a tiered plan over a mortgagee's objection.<sup>20</sup>

Finally, § 1326(b) requires that administrative-expense claims be paid "[b]efore or at the time of each payment to creditors under the plan," which administrative expenses include attorneys' fees to a debtor's counsel. If chapter 13 plans had to start equal monthly payments to secured creditors just after confirmation, some bankruptcy courts caution that debtors might be unable to pay both administrative claims and secured creditors at the same time.<sup>21</sup> In these cases, debtors could not propose a confirmable plan, which is — according to some courts — "an absurd result that Congress could not have intended."<sup>22</sup>

Argument Against Tiered Chapter 13 Plans

Interpreting the same statutory language, another line of cases has rejected tiered plans. These courts hold that tiered plans violate the Bankruptcy Code by impermissibly favoring payment to debtor's counsel and other administrative claims over secured creditors. In addition, at least one court has held that proposing a tiered plan can constitute bad faith.<sup>23</sup>

These courts first emphasize that when Congress enacted § 1325(a)(5)(B)(iii)(I), it intended to shift the risk of failure away from secured creditors.<sup>24</sup> However, a tiered plan shifts the risk the opposite way, favoring debtor's counsel and other administrative-expense claimants over the very creditors that Congress intended to protect.<sup>25</sup>

These courts continue that providing smaller adequate-protection payments during any delay under a tiered plan violates the plain language of § 1325(a)(5)(B)(iii)(I).<sup>26</sup> In reality, adequate-protection payments are "periodic payments."<sup>27</sup> Post-confirmation, all "periodic payments" must be in equal monthly amounts under § 1325(a)(5)(B)(iii)(I). Thus, allowing a chapter 13 plan to pay smaller adequate-protection payments in the first few months of a plan, with larger plan payments to follow, violates the plain language of § 1325(a)(5)(B)(iii)(I).<sup>28</sup>

Next, these courts have concluded that § 1326(b) does not require that administrative expenses be paid in full before plan payments to secured creditors begin.<sup>29</sup> Instead, § 1326(b) expressly allows administrative-expense claims and plan payments to secured creditors to be paid concurrently:

Section 1326(b) only requires payment of allowed administrative expenses "[b]efore or at the time of each payment to creditors under the plan." Clearly, that section permits creditors to be paid concurrently with administrative expenses.<sup>30</sup>

There is no language in § 1326(b)(1) allowing a debtor to favor administrative-expense claims over secured creditors entitled to equal monthly payments.<sup>31</sup> Consequently, "in instances where both §§ 1325(a)(5)(B) and 1326(b)(1) apply, debtors 'need to calculate plan payments sufficient to provide for these payments and for payment of attorney fees and other administrative expenses.'"<sup>32</sup>

More recently, one bankruptcy court held that a debtor's attorney had filed a chapter 13 plan in bad faith by proposing tiered payments to secured creditors.<sup>33</sup> The court held that the tiered plan was not in the debtor's best interests because it not only shifted risk to secured creditors (in violation of congressional intent), it also shifted risk to the debtor.<sup>34</sup> During the delay period, secured debt would be left unpaid. If the plan failed during that period or shortly afterward, the debtor might be left "in a worse position that had [he/she] not filed for bankruptcy" in the first place.<sup>35</sup> This could be true even if the plan had provided adequate protection during the delay. Adequate-protection payments are often less than the contractual payments due, so if the case were dismissed before equal monthly payments began, "the debtor [would] automatically [be] in default under the terms of the contract ... even if the debtor had been current with the terms of the bankruptcy plan."<sup>36</sup>

Conclusion

When it amended §§ 1325 and 1326, Congress intended to eliminate perceived abuses of chapter 13, these amendments have instead created more confusion. Not only are bankruptcy courts within the same district interpreting these amendments differently, but at least one court has determined that proposing a tiered plan constitutes bad faith, leaving debtors and their counsel with no clear guidance on how to balance payments to administrative-expense claimants and secured creditors. No matter what policy decision is ultimately made, Congress must step in and resolve the issue way or the other. An amendment as simple as setting forth when equal monthly payments to secured creditors must begin under § 1325(a)(5)(B)(iii)(I) is likely all that is needed to do so. abi
